Farm Pond Construction Calls For Many Decisions

The farm pond and flood control business is booming in Virginia.

And with the increased interest in and need for farm ponds and flood control structures has come a corresponding increase in the questions being asked about how best to construct them, reports J. B. Burford, project leader for VPI's research in watershed technology.

Burford points out that many important decisions must be made for each pond and each flood control structure that is built. For instance, how much water can be expected to run off of a given area during the average year? What is the instantaneous maximum amount of water that will ever flow from the area during the life of a pond or reservoir? How high must the dam be to provide adequate storage and protection? How large must the spillway be to allow the peak flows to pass without damage to the dams?

Much of the information now available is the result of very large areas such as river watersheds, or on very small areas, and is not necessarily applicable to medium-sized areas.

This is where the VPI watershed hydrology research project, and others in the country, fit into the overall picture. In Virginia there are now eight areas instrumented to give rainfall and runoff information. These areas range from 185 to almost 3,000 acres, and are located in seven different counties. The first was instrumented in 1957, and Burford says he and his fellow researchers plan to instrument two more watersheds this year.

Several years of data are needed to produce reliable results. Scientists consider 10 to 15 years to be the minimum. However, they are getting some information now that can be used. Total annual runoff as low as 3.7 inches from one acre, and a maximum of 22.6 inches from another have been measured. These figures contrast with the long-time annual average of 15 inches of runoff from Virginia, as measured and reported by the U. S. Geological survey.

In many areas of Virginia, Burford says, the small water ponds are the answer to the farmer's water needs if suitable locations are available. The current watershed protection and flood prevention programs which are promoted and partially supported by the U. S. Department of Agriculture are primarily an attempt to solve the problem of too much water.

The Soil Conservation Service reports that from 1,500 to 2,000 farm ponds have been constructed each year for the past few years in Virginia. A total of 16,316 farm ponds were constructed under the program during the 12-year period through 1957. If all these ponds were put together into one big lake, it would have a surface area of about 22,900 acres, or 35 square miles.

The State Soil Conservation Committee reports that assistance in watershed protection and flood prevention has been applied for on 13 watersheds in Virginia. Eleven of these, ranging from about 19 to 675 square miles, have been approved by the committee.
